Sergeant Hilton appears in the village, and, almost immediately, a German detachment follows him. Through Miriam, who believes him to be a government official, he has already learned of the ammunition repository; so, on the arrival of the troops, he hastens to impart his news, his treachery unknown to the residents of the chateau. In his excitement he loses the little black book which he always carries, and it is found by Miss Smith, who, after reading it here and there, sends a mysterious message by Vilette, a French peasant girl. Meanwhile, the guns begin, and Cecile, by means of a secret telephone, communicates with those in charge of the ammunition and directs the firing. Suddenly the Sergeant enters, demands the book whose loss he has discovered...
